Le Roy, engineer of the new street railway company, was not at all surprised to meet at the church party given by the president of his road his landlady's daughter. He was becoming thoroughly accustomed to the democratic social life of this midwest city. Moreover, he was deeply interested in this same landlady's daughter.

He had heard that her parents, the Vintons, belonged to a fine old Philadelphia family and had come west when adversity crossed their path. Certainly all the outward and visible signs in Frank's case indicated a born right to fine linen and idleness, and apparently the fall in the family fortunes had never reduced her to giving up either. Le Roy thought her gown a marvel of elegant simplicity. It was only when she spoke that he knew she was not so rich. Her father's daughter across the table read a different story.

Le Roy won the booby prize that night because he studied the languid droop of a certain brown head and the curve of a white neck instead of his cards. And what the evening under electric lights commenced the witchery of the walk home in the moonlight with Frank and her younger brother George completed.

The weeks that followed found him speculating and drawing conclusions on everything that happened about the house. He remembered that all the time he had been there the only servant ever seen was the gawky young girl who waited on the table. Frank came to her meals daintily dressed, languid and untroubled, but very late. And Le Roy began to suspect that there was no helplessness as she looked. Try as he would, he never could discover any traces of what she did. Stout, sweet, motherly Mrs. Vinton must be a wonderful housekeeper, and so might Frank be with a house of her own.

But in this comfortable house there was one Bluebeard's chamber, the kitchen. The entrance to the dining room was protected by a double screen. From that chamber of mystery there came such noises as the clatter of spoons, the clatter of plates, the clatter of a hot, pasty puff and delicate, as boarder never before put to mouth. The Vintons' cook was no doubt a treasure.

How was all this and everything about the house done with so little friction? Even the boots which he, true Briton, stuck outside his door each night had never been polished so well, but the boots? who did them? How was it that the great color rising in the pale cheeks of a mischievous light in her eyes, was questioning her husband.

"You have never told your mother and sisters you married the daughter of your boarding house keeper?" "Never remotely hinted at it, darling." "Said mother belonged to one of the most aristocratic Philadelphia families?" "Yes, my dear, I married on that."

"I found long ago that most people respected me who worked, but rather looked down, especially women. I knew American women, and I've heard English women are worse, and if you don't follow my directions I'll torment you to death. Swear on this book."

"It's the Bible?" "Yes, my dear." "This is becoming serious. Did I ever break a promise? What am I to swear, light of my eyes?" said the big, fond fellow.

"That you'll never remotely hint that father made soups, and mother cooked the meats, and I made the pastry and did the chamber work, and George washed the dishes and scrubbed, and this was the way your wife's family were enabled to hold their heads up in the world. Do you suppose that if I waited on the table that girl did down the street you'd have ever looked at me twice? If your sisters knew what I know now, they'd look down on me. I have read that country bred English women are narrow, and what I ask is easy—your part. Now, Clumey, swear on the book again to do as I bid. Repeat it after me—promise to my wife!"

"My wife?" "Answer all my mother's and sister's questions, every one!"

"Every one?" "And I will never look surprised at what she says, or wink, or lift an eyebrow."

"An eyebrow," he iterated delightedly, then rubbed hers the wrong way and kissed it.

That evening saw them seated in the dining room of the fine old mansion on the Le Roy estate. The cut glass and the old silver shone bravely in the bride's honor. She looked delicate and aristocratic beside the large, fine, red checked English lasses. They admired her openly with their eyes, and finally Maude, the younger, ventured to do so orally.

"Having a boy?" "Yes, my dear."

"And I will never look surprised at what she says, or wink, or lift an eyebrow."
